That part of these data which is used in the present discussion, together with the constants calculated from them, are given in the Appendix. Unless otherwise stated all the measurements are from mature females. I. The Taxonomy of Gryllus Native to Eastern States. De Vries (1904) considers that specific characters are usually sharply defined against one another. They are, according to him, separate qualities more often than different degrees of the same quality. This is not true of the crickets, as they are now named. One species does not possess units which the others of the same genus lack, but one species differs from the others merely in the degree of common characters. Presence or absence of characters (e. g., mobility of tibia! spines, teeth between these spines, etc.) are considered of generic or higher value. Davenport Blankinship (1898) have expressed the expectation that biometry would furnish us with a precise criterion of species and would, in part at least, clear away the haziness which exists in the taxonomy of most orders of both plants and animals. This haziness is most pronounced where species are based, as they are in the Grylline, upon differences in size of characters common to the different species, and not upon de Vriesian units. When starting this work I hoped that a statistical study of relatively large collections might bring out several sharply defined groups upon which we could logically fix specific names. The extremely frequent appearance of Gryllus sp. in otherwise detailed taxonomic...
