Excerpt: . . . the lavish display of luxury and sumptuous living that glitters and glows along its boulevards, yet back of this dazzle and glare, away from the marble mansions and the gold-coining mart, the great majority are herding in hovels and fighting for life mid environments and associates that render escape impossible and existence a curse. To see and know the truth of city-life we must go not upon the wide, well-paved thoroughfares, where dwell the rich and prosperous in commodious homes, but where the poor and unfortunate burrow in crowded houses and crawl through narrow and dingy streets and alleys. CHAPTER IV. THE HOVELS WHERE HOMELESS THOUSANDS DWELL. The lower million in every city exist close to the upper ten, yet their presence, though near, in fact, is deemed but the figment of a disordered fancy, and but little thought and less care is given to them in any direction that would lead to their discovery and consequent betterment. A visit to a region of poverty, degradation, and crime, where hope and thrift are unknown, may not be without its lesson. It is a strange anomaly in human life that within an area of one hundred blocks forming a portion of what is known as the South Side in Chicago can be found the owners of colossal fortunes and human beings in the most abject poverty, --palaces filled with plenty and luxury and huts ever haunted with hunger and want, --troops of children sporting on shaded...
