By The Bibliographic Service, August 7 AN UNUSUAL RIGHT LUNG MATTHEW MARSHALL Anatomical Laboratories, The School of Medicine, University of Pittsburgh In the course of the regular dissection an unusual right lung was found recently. In brief, its interesting features were: 1. A rudimentary middle lobe so hidden in the interlobular fissure as to make the lung appear two-lobed from a simple surface inspection, and 2. An unusual distribution of the second lateral bronchus. The inferior interlobular fissure did not reach the diaphragmatic surface, but turned around the ventral margin on to the mediastinal surface and thence dorsalward and slightly upward to the hilus. The superior interlobular fissure separating the middle and superior lobes was not evident from the mediastinal surface; that is, there was no evidence of a middle lobe from surface inspection of the mediastinal surface of the lung. On widely divaricating the...
